Dealing with Wind Damage Claims

When a catastrophe happens, everything can seem to happen quickly and painfully slow at the same time. Dealing with the emergency aspect and all the immediate problems at hand. But what happens once the emergency passes, putting everything back together can be painfully slow. The next few days, weeks and months can seem overwhelming to even the most organized and level-headed property or business owner. It can be confusing to know what your next step should be, who to call, in what order to complete tasks, and in the process do and say the right things to ensure that you're paid what is truly due you from the insurance carrier.

You've probably realized that the next steps will involve dealing with insurance companies, repair contractors and an unknown list of tasks that you're not even aware of yet. What should you do to ensure that you get the most from your property insurance claim? Now is the best time to involve a professional who can help reduce your feelings of stress and anxiety so that your life can return to normal.

Understanding Your Insurance Policy

Finding and understanding the information in your insurance policy can be invaluable and can help prioritize the most important tasks to complete at this time.

Section 1 Conditions and/or Your Duties After a Loss

This section of your policy is essentially a compliance to-do list with your insurance policy.

It is important to adhere to your responsibilities listed in this section to ensure the insurance company isn't provided with a reason to not pay or deny your claim.

Some examples of your duties after loss may include actions such as

- Secure your property as best as possible immediately.
 - Photograph it and ask your adjuster if more can be done via email.
- Provide documentation proving your damages.
 - We recommend that you take photos and videos. You should take more than seems reasonable. Open all drawers, cabinets, pantries, closets, items under sinks, items on shelves, anything stored in the attic, etc. Even if you are unsure if it is damaged, document it.
 - Provide estimates of mitigation, and repairs.
 - Receipts
- Supply the insurance company with other records, such as financial statements when requested.
- Make your property available for inspection as much as is reasonably possible.
- Your policy may not require you to submit a "recorded statement". Before declining we recommend speaking with an attorney. Further along in this guide we discuss declining recorded statements.

When you're dealing with storm damage, you want to make sure that you document all of the damage to your home. Insurance companies will need to know what they're working with in order to get your claims process rolling.

Even when a storm produces no rain or hail, your roof can still sustain damage. Strong winds can create stress points on a roof that, over time, can weaken and become compromised.

While roofs are designed to resist typical wind loads, they can be incrementally damaged over the years by high winds and debris carried by the wind.

Identifying Damage

Some signs of roof wind damage are easy to see, especially after severe storms. However, if you need to identify more subtle signs of roof wind damage, a trained eye can help.

First, look at your ceilings.

Water spots on your ceiling are an early indicator of a roof leak that could be caused from wind damage on your roof.

Next, look at the roof itself.

Strong winds can get under roof shingles causing the edges to lift. The resulting gap can leave underlying roof materials exposed to moisture during hard-driving rains. Also, these shingles may eventually tear off if left unrepaired.

When discussing roof wind damage, we can't leave out the obvious. Sometimes, external wind-blown objects can damage your roof.

Like the tree that crushed the edge of this roof. This situation requires an immediate response to avoid interior damage.

Thoroughly document any damage that occurred and keep receipts for all work, including any you do yourself, such as covering windows or holes in your roof to facilitate reimbursement if you file a claim. Many policies will cover these expenses when submitted with a claim.

The first steps after a storm are crucial. If you have been affected by a storm, or have questions and need to speak with a licensed public adjuster, call or text us at (888) 503-5009

Document & Organize Every Step of the Claim Process

Settling a claim is a war of attrition. Your insurance company will likely have you jump through hoops that seem unreasonable.

When your home is damaged, handling your claim requires a lot of time and attention. You will discuss important claim facts with your insurance agent and adjuster and review damages with your contractor. You'll have to keep track of receipts, contracts and bills. You may have to document hotel bills and other additional living expenses.

How to document your claim

- Take photos of your damaged home and personal property, beginning from the date of the occurrence and continuing with regular photo updates as repairs are completed.
 - For one room you should have roughly 40 photos.
- Keep notes of relevant in-person conversations to refresh your memory about important claim discussions.
- Email the adjuster or their vendors confirmation emails reiterating the conversations you had.
- Chronologically document dates and times of phone calls to agents, contractors and adjusters so you can remind them of important conversations they might not remember.
- Keep track of bills and receipts for an organized presentation when it's time to turn in your final claim expenses.
- Never send the insurance company an original bill without making a copy for yourself
- Organize documents, bills, receipts, and notes in a folder. It makes it easier to pass on your information should you choose to hire a professional to handle your claim issues.
- Keep copies of everything.
